Klamath--Timber and Salmon Eldorado

"Klamath's 'Roving Town' Main street, where Highway 101 meanders with a busy, booming lumber and sports fishing population.

"Looking across the Douglas Memorial bridge where Highway 101 enters Klamath from the south. Before the bridge was built in 1920, the river was crossed by ferry only.

Fast-Growing City Leads in Payrolls

Here is a town on highway 101, some 65 miles north of Eureka, which has another of those mathematics settings for which Redwood Empire is famous, but with one difference. Klamath is located on the Redwood Empire's mightiest river, the Klamath, where all fishermen must go on their own pilgrimage.

There was a time in peaceful days before the Great Depression hit the west, when Klamath was a one-town season. The river's salmon, with its early catch of steelhead and salmon, was the little settlement's All. From July to October, inclusive, there were weeks upon weeks of full lakes. The rest of the year, the towns more or less lacked its fish and fixed for next season's work. For months and months, Klamath was in a state of fitful activity, for there was no room for anything else but fishing. Klamath, at the height of its good fishing season, might have been a sea of smoke. The town was not a ghost town like many a northern California settlement, but it was something approaching the description. Where Klamath stood in those years, there was a town of docks and tents and a lot of tents and a lot of tents. Klamath is now an active fishing center, a town of men, and a lot of men, and a lot of men, and a lot of men. Here people have come in from all parts of the world to try their luck at salmon fishing. New and permanent housing has been built in place of old, ramshackle shacks. The town is prospering, and the people find it a much better place to live. A census of this year shows that the population of Klamath has increased from 1000 to 5000. The town continues to grow, and the people are happy.
