Find Relics of Old Culture Here

Ganther Island Indian Burials Are Explored by Eureka Man

By GEORGE HOFFMANN

What kind of people lived along the shores of Humboldt Bay 2000 years before the coming of the white man? How did they live, what kind of civilization did they have? How did they get along with one another? These are the questions that archaeologists and anthropologists are trying to answer.

Quickly jumping to a location on the map of the North Pacific, you find a place called Ganther Island. Over there, Dr. Stuart wants to find out more about the people who lived there.

Dr. Stuart has been exploring the site for several years, but the work is far from over. He has found several thousand artifacts, including pottery, stone tools, and other items that tell us about the lives of the people who lived there.

Dr. Stuart's work is not just局限于 the physical artifacts. He is also looking at the cultural and social aspects of the people who lived there.

Dr. Stuart's research has been published in several journals, including the Journal of Anthropological Research and the American Anthropologist.

Conclusion

In conclusion, Dr. Stuart's work on Ganther Island is just beginning. He is still discovering new artifacts and learning more about the lives of the people who lived there. As he continues his research, we can expect to learn even more about these ancient people and their way of life.

A few of the many arrowheads that Dr. Stuart has in his collection of artifacts that he has dug up in Indian mounds.

Close-up of a "stone killer" of these strange ceremonial objects that seem to have passed completely out of the culture and knowledge of the Indians of the same country.

The Humboldt Indian was a basket maker, weaving and basketry were both common activities among these Indians. His name is found on a number of baskets that have been dug up in the region.

Planted Tobacco

The Humboldt Indian was a basket maker, weaving and basketry were both common activities among these Indians. His name is found on a number of baskets that have been dug up in the region.

Planted Tobacco

The Humboldt Indian was a basket maker, weaving and basketry were both common activities among these Indians. His name is found on a number of baskets that have been dug up in the region.