Gold Rush Town Coming Into Own As New Era Opens

The moment you set foot upon Rohnerville, you realize that here is another of Humboldt's and Northern California's historic towns. Pioneer type buildings still line its main street, with their false fronts and spindled porches. And once upon a time there were many more, including four hotels, but five in the past thirty years have taken heavy toll.

Other towns of the old school also took their toll of Rohnerville. When the railroad built through it, it bypassed the town. And when it left the railroad's example, it seemed that Rohnerville's cup of adversity had runneth over. For many a year thereafter, the little town dwindled amid its hills and rolling fields, seeming to live only by its agriculture and a few scattered groves of native oak. In this setting a few hardy souls continued to live, and during the last year or two a small and increasing interest has manifested itself in the town, indicated by the number of people who have moved in. Now, instead of being a dead end, it seems as though the old town of Rohnerville is coming into its own.

The New Era is building ahead

The town is growing. A new hotel, the Rohnerville House, is under construction, and a new store is being built. Many new houses are being erected, and the old town is taking on a new lease of life.

The New Era has come to Rohnerville. The old town is being revived, and there is a feeling of optimism in the air. The town is no longer forgotten, but is once again a place of interest. The old pioneer homes are being restored, and new buildings are being erected. The town is no longer a dead end, but is growing and prospering.
